WELCOME, BIENVENUE

Organising the 10th IPA conference is both a challenge and an honour. Not only the number and origins of participants have exceeded all our expectations but the diversity of the 65 panels will surely contribute to enhance our understanding of the interconnections between public policies and the publics. This year's theme once more departs from positivist policy analysis since we claim policy-making is embedded in the diversity of publics – as policy products as well as policy actors. A critical policy analysis requires studying publics' contribution to policy-making and, simultaneously, how publics are constructed in the process.

Over 400 attendees will be presenting their investigations which cover key contemporary issues at all levels of government – such as budgetary discipline and austerity, climate change and energy, immigration and citizenship, health and social policies, agriculture, trade and urban policies, public-private partnerships, etc. – and question the role of various stakeholders of public policies: from bureaucrats, experts, think tankers to lobbyists, journalists and eventually citizens, be they engaged in participatory devices or in more contentious struggles. Moreover, the panels are not only addressing classical concepts of policy analysis such as problem definition, argumentation, deliberation or expertise but they also highlight new perspectives: numbers and indicators, public emotions or the role of fiction in connecting policies and their publics to name a few. The keynote conferences delivered by Pr. Vincent Dubois and Pr. Nina Eliasoph will stimulatingly open and close our meeting. As for the round table “Magic and magicians in policy-making”, we are confident it will satisfy the curiosity of many participants and enchant all of them.

For three days, Lille will be the centre of the world... for a significant number of political scientists, coming from more than 40 different countries, a lot of them being non-EU countries, such as Argentina, Australia, Azerbaijan, Brazil, Canada, China, Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Ivory Coast, Israel, Mexico, New Zealand, The Philippines, Singapore, South Africa, Uganda, USA, Zambia. Nothing unusual for a city where Pierre De Geyter, a Belgian worker and musician, composed the music of the Internationale at the end of the 19th century. Under the aegis of such a political reference, we do hope that you will enjoy these three days in Lille and that you will “strike the iron while it is hot” to open new avenues of thinking.

Offering such a rich and compelling programme will never have been possible without the support of the following institutions: Lille 2 University, Sciences Po Lille, the MESHS, the Regional Council, the Departmental Council, Lille Metropole and the City of Lille.

Finally, we wish to acknowledge our gratitude to all the staff who helped us plan and organise this conference.

HOST INSTITUTIONS

Center for European Research on Administration, Politics and Society (CERAPS)

The Center for European Research on Administration, Politics and Society (CERAPS) was founded in 1976 as part of the Law School of the University of Lille 2.

Since 1979, the Center is a unit of the National Centre for Scientific Research (CNRS) and belongs to its law, sociology and political science sections.

The Center staff includes about fifty university professors and CNRS full-time research fellows in political science, public law and sociology. The research center also hosts and trains an average sixty PhD students half in law and half in political science. Its main research areas are: public policy, including at the local level; international law, changes in administrative law and the role of the state; information technology (IT) law; transformation of democracy with a focus on political participation i.e. social movements, elections and political organizations.

Lille 2 University of Health and Law

Situated at the very heart of Europe, Lille 2 University benefits from special links with Europe's most prestigious capitals and cities: Paris, Brussels, Cologne, Amsterdam, and accordingly maintains a resolutely international focus.

At the heart of a metropolitan area with over 1 million inhabitants and over 100,000 students, Lille 2 offers a wide variety of educational opportunities, adapted to the needs and changes of the global economy in the areas of Law, Healthcare, Business Administration and Sport.

Lille 2 University offers its students a top-quality education within the European norms of Licence (Bachelor), Master and Doctorate, providing maximum opportunity of future success in the workplace.

The University draws its international dimension from the richness and variety of its courses. It relies on a 4 century history whose quest for excellence goes on. Linked to the great national research organisations, the University brings together world famous researchers in laboratories equipped with the latest technology.

Sciences Po Lille

As an international institute, Sciences Po Lille is a highly public institute of higher education specialized in law, the humanities and social sciences (political science, economics, history and sociology).

Created in 1991, Sciences Po Lille is one of France's nine prestigious Institutes for Political Studies. These highly selective and elite institutes function under the aegis of the National Foundation of Political Science.

Sciences Po Lille constantly strives to reinforce its international standing by developing partnerships with international universities, working with international partners to expand the selection of dual Master's degree programs, and welcoming a greater number international students.

With its decidedly international focus, Sciences Po Lille welcomes exceptional students and prepares them for high-level careers in the private and public sectors, international organizations, NGO's, European Institutions, senior civil service and human resources. Many of the graduates also find success in the fields of journalism, teaching and research.

SPECIAL SCIENTIFIC EVENTS

First Keynote Conference : Vincent Dubois : What do public policies do to their publics?

08/07/15 : 10:30-12:00

BIOGRAPHY

Vincent Dubois is sociologist and political scientist at the University of Strasbourg (Institute for Political Studies), attached to SAGE (UMR CNRS 7363), research associate at the European Center for Sociology and Political Science (Paris), honorary member of the University Institute of France (2007- 2012), a member of the Florence Gould Institute for advanced study in Princeton (United States) for the 2012-2013 academic year, Usías for the academic years 2014-2016.

His research focuses on the sociology and political culture, language policies, the public treatment of poverty and more generally on the public action sociology. He is currently working on welfare recipients control policies.

SUMMARY

The impact policies have on people cannot be reduced neither to changes in their environment, nor to the provision of a service. As Everett Hughes famously put it, doing something for someone is always also doing something to someone. The question is therefore what public policies do to the individuals who form their publics. Drawing on Bourdieu's notion of habitus, I will explore how and with which limits the enforcement of social norms through public policies can affect the representations, the dispositions and the attitudes of the persons subjected to it, in addition to possible changes in their status. Examples will be taken mainly from my research on cultural policy and social welfare.

Second Keynote Conference : Nina Eliasoph : What is Empowerment?

10/07/15 : 14:30-16:00

BIOGRAPHY

Nina Eliasoph is professor of sociology at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles. Her research interests include the enunciation of policy and political culture of individuals, studied in various civic organizations and / or political (ranging from grassroots civic associations and activist groups, to nonprofits and NGOs); thus, she has published Avoiding Politics: How Americans Produce Apathy in Everyday Life (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK, 1998), in which she studied how members various small civic groups talk - or not – about “politics”, both within their groups and in their encounters with government, media and corporate authorities ; Making Volunteers: Civic Life After Welfare’s End, in which she shows the gap between regular reports on the political and autonomous participation and citizenship models promoted by non-profit organizations and NGOs; The Politics of Volunteering (Polity Press, Cambridge, UK, 2012) offers a historical comparison between volunteerism and political involvement.

SUMMARY

There is a newly prevalent kind of organization that does not yet have a name. Tentatively, we can call it “the empowerment project.” Empowerment projects, unlike old-fashioned activist groups or volunteer groups, are not funded by the participants, but by external funders; and they try to solve social problems without engaging in political conflict. Beyond these structural conditions, they have missions that conflict with one another, in predictable ways. Empowerment projects aim to:

- Promote civic engagement: equality, openness, reasonableness
- Promote appreciation of local, unique people, places and customs (not necessarily “openness”)
- Provide inspiration, challenge (not necessarily “appreciation” of all unique people, places and customs)
- Raise up the needy (not necessarily civic “equality”)
- Provide frequent and transparent documentation of rapid success, in terms that socially or geographically distant donors with short time-lines will understand.

The point is both to show how these missions typically conflict (by drawing on my own and others' work), and to figure out what the universe of organizations that share these characteristics is. This second endeavor is not simple, since some, but not all, of the following types of organizations can be empowerment projects: non-governmental organizations, municipal participatory budget projects, economic development projects, social service agencies, social enterprises, or humanitarian aid projects.

What good does it do to give this organizational form its own name? It is useful for the same reasons people in the 19th and 20th century needed the name "bureaucracy": naming it allows us to see family resemblances, to predict conflicts, and perhaps to share solutions to the predictable problems in them.

SUMMARY

Such a provocative roundtable, entitled “magic and magicians of public policy”, is evidently rooted in the Weberian concept of enchantment and disenchantment of the world. The bottom line is to discuss whether all kind of magics have disappeared from legal-rational societies and/or from policy-making. Anthropologists studying African, South-East Asian and Latin-American Indian politics have regularly stated to what extent “traditional” discourses and practices on witchcraft (white magic) and sorcery (black magic) have shown surprisingly resilient in the face of “modernity”.

The relationships between “magic” and “modernity” are extremely complex, refer to hybridation and are clear manifestations of the re-enchantment of “modernity” (Geschiere 1997). As such, in Post-colonial Africa, it is common to analyse the explosion of new forms of wealth amidst utter poverty through the lenses of sorcery and witchcraft. Magic is often a proxy for capitalist exploitation, since the rapidity in which certain businessmen accumulate enormous amounts of economic capital is often explained by their abilities to resort to occult forces and to the traffic of zombies (Fisiy and Geschiere 1991). In Post-Apartheid rural South Africa, the living dead remains a popular figure to refer to the immigrant, the “non standard” worker, which is held responsible for the unemployment and economic crisis. Zombies are not held as fantastic fables but are generally taken for granted in respectable local newspapers, in labour disputes, in popular culture (documentaries, theatrical productions, songs) and even in provincial commissions of inquiry into Witchcraft Violence and Ritual Murder. The repetition of discourses vis-à-vis the rise of the living deads and the Zombie makers which exploit them, make the threat of the spectral workforce all too concrete (Comaroff and Comaroff 1999).

Are western capitalist democracies immune to such practices and discourses? Various pieces of evidence show that it is obviously not the case. A significant amount of so-called rational concepts and ideas are deeply rooted in invisible forces. Think about Adam Smith’s “invisible hand” that is meant to drive market forces; about the (non-popperian) concept of charisma that is frequently used in politics but very rarely demonstrated ; or the relevance of opinion polls for decision-makers where opinion analysts are turned into modern haruspices who drive “opinion-responsive government”. Political science itself is often embedded in what Bernard Lacroix calls the “animist tradition” (Lacroix 1984) where scholars grant existence to legal or scientific fictions: the State does this; the market is receptive to such and such incentives ; there is a social demand for such projects, and so on.

A set of questions can help structuring the roundtable:

1. Who can be held as magicians, sorcerers and witches in allegedly rational society? Are we not facing magic when policy designers and reformers claim they can solve problems rationally, when they offer new problematisations to old problems, new “paradigms” (Hall 1993), “causal stories” (Stone 2001) or “narratives” (Roe 1994). They may bring new reasons to believe in the way the State and administrations can make a difference, they may boost the illusio and libido of disenchanted civil servants and citizens (Gaxie 1999: 9). To what extent can experts be held as magicians for policy-makers who are in need for “miracle solutions”; notably in critical junctures (Fischer 1990)?

2. In a similar vein, to what extent are politicians and their partners sincere/cynical when they claim “yes we can”, “le changement, c’est maintenant” or “Podemos”, although policy analysis has now shown for decades that the policy process was not only a “policy mess” but also locked in path dependent processes? Are we meant to be left disenchanted or do we have to redefine or better conceptualise the nature of truth? What is the status of truth for decision-makers: a fake illusion? A dirty manipulative trick designed to convince gullible masses? Or a myth in the Antique sense of the term (Veyne 1988)?

3. In this respect, the contributions of policy analysts and scholars should be taken into account since they are very close to – and sometimes embedded in – the field they are meant to study. Through their articles, books, reports, do academics contribute to re-arrange, to put in words and scientific order what is usually a policy mess?

4. To open up the debate even further, one can wonder about language as a political resource, since it is a mean to construct beliefs about the significance of events, of problems, of crises, of policy changes, and of leaders, in order to legitimise certain courses of action, threaten or reassure people so as to encourage them to be supportive or to remain quiescent. As we know, the symbolic dimension is a crucial component of public policy, but who are the sorcerers of language and numbers (Porter 1995)?
